It's been estimated that adults make as much as 35,000 decisions a day—what to eat, how to react, what to do, and so on. And we can only surmise that women make even more decisions as they represent the largest market opportunity globally, according to studies. More than a decade ago, it was estimated that women controlled $20 trillion in consumer spending, with that number rising to $28 trillion in the five years that followed.

With that much purchasing power and thousands of options to choose from, deciding on what to buy can be particularly challenging—especially in the wellness space, of which women form a majority of consumers. From detox teas to diet shakes, skincare and supplements, the options can seem never ending. How can those women who simply want to live a healthier lifestyle find the right supplement to address their concerns?

The Modern Revival of an Ancient Remedy

In the last few years, as people's interest in naturally-derived supplements have grown, one particular ingredient has slowly gained people's attention, not only for the many scientifically-backed benefits it claims, but also because of its rich

Aside from a host of vitamins, minerals, and essential fatty acids, the primary compound present in Shilajit is fulvic acid, a known antioxidant. This makes Shilajit known to have adaptogenic properties. These adaptogens normally found in organic materials such as herbs, roots, plant substances, and resins, help our bodies manage stress and restore balance. Because of this, Shilajit has often been used as a rejuvenator and an anti-aging compound.

For example, in a placebo-controlled trial with women, those who took Shilajit tablets experienced increased sexual function compared to the control group. Meanwhile, in a study involving men aged 45–55 taking 250mg of Shilajit twice daily for 90 days, results showed significant increases in their testosterone levels.

Shilajit's fulvic acid content may also improve brain health by reducing oxidative stress and inflammation. Studies have suggested that Shilajit can aid in memory, focus, and even reduce anxiety. Lastly, the fulvic acid in Shilajit also plays a key role in enhancing mitochondrial function—the membrane-bound organelles in our cells that generate energy to power its reactions. Studies have shown that among those who regularly supplement with Shilajit, noticeable improvements in both energy and physical activity were seen.
